Southern Cross began its existence as a mining claim during Montana's gold rush of the mid-1860's. Off and on for eighty years thereafter, immigrant miners harvested gold and silver for the mining companies who came and went, little bothering to clean up the mountainside after themselves. As they eked out a livelihood, the mostly Finn and ...

People pushed to get close as the postmistress read a cable: "At 7:00 p.m., Sunday March 29, a wireless message from Channel–Port aux Basques, on the southwest corner of Newfoundland, informed St. John's that on Saturday, the twenty-eighth, about 6:30 p.m., the Southern Cross was spotted passing about seven miles out. She was down in the head with all flags flying, a signal that the barque was going home with a bumper crop estimated between 17,000-25,000 pelts."

Generations believed and were taught the glow of the trees at night was evidence of the presence of living spirits and at least one story from Aboriginal astronomy emerged in the dreamtime indicating the Southern Cross was a Ghost Gum with two Sulphur-crested Cockatoos trying to roost on its branches.. Beyond the spiritual, the tree provided good firewood, even resistance to rain.
